What affected the Fund's performance this period?

The Shelton Emerging Markets Fund returned 1.41% in 2024, underperforming the MSCI Emerging Markets return of 8.00% by -6.59%. Key drivers of performance during 2024 included country exposures, specifically overweights in Latin America, and an underweight in India. These positions were minor, but added up to a considerable headwind during the year. The fund's exposure to momentum stocks was low. Additionally, the sizeable positions of Taiwan Semiconductor (over 10%) and Tencent (nearly 5%) in the index are hard to replicate in a diversified portfolio.

Other contributors were positions in certain stocks including Indian consultancy Wipro and Taiwan-based Realtek Semiconductor as well as over-weight allocations versus the benchmark to certain strongly performing industries including airlines and textiles. Additionally, positions in Anta Sports and Korean Air detracted from performance.

Regional Insights

- China: Chinese equities lagged significantly due to structural challenges in the property sector, weak consumer confidence, and subdued export demand. Domestic stimulus measures offered some relief but were insufficient to reignite broader investor sentiment. The fund remained inline in our allocation and avoided most of the volatility.
- India and ASEAN: India and Southeast Asia stood out as bright spots, with robust GDP growth and strong domestic consumption driving equity gains. Technology and infrastructure-related sectors in these markets were notable outperformers. The fund was underweight to India, detracting from performance.
- Latin America: Latin American equities delivered mixed results. Mexico and Brazil underperformed significantly after strong 2023 performances, impacted by political instability and weaker commodity exports, particularly to China. The fund continued to hold larger positions in the region, reversing many of the gain from the previous year.
